

Survival Project

How would it feel like to be born with a deformed face and having go to middle school, or being a stowaway hiding in a wheel well. Well in this essay it will explain the similarities and differences between the two, the book Wonder by R.J Palacio, and the article “Teen Stowaway”. The three things I will be comparing are main/central idea, tools/strategies, and theme.

This paragraph is about the main/central idea. One way that Wonder and “Teen Stowaway” are similar is that both of them are about two brave people trying to survive something. “Teen Stowaway” is different from Wonder in its main/central idea because in the article the teen is showing how brave he was to hide in the wheel well. In Wonder August was a character with a birth defect and he wasn't scared to start school.

This paragraph is about the tools/strategies. A way that the book and the article had similar tools/strategies is that both of them had something that helped them along the way. In the “Teen Stowaway” article the teen hid behind something that generated a little heat so he wouldn't die. In Wonder August his family and friends to help in through some hard times.

This paragraph is about theme. A way both the article and the book are the same in theme is that both have to expect the unexpected. In the theme is always be prepared. In the book Wonder the theme is don't judge a boy by his face.

In this essay you have read the similarities and differences of main/central idea, tools/strategies, and theme of the book Wonder and the article “Teen Stowaway”. Each of these paragraphs have the differences and similarities of the book Wonder and the article “Teen Stowaway”.
